The Library is delighted to offer reading rights to all members of the Classical Association who are aged 18 or over. This does not include borrowing rights which are only granted to members of the Hellenic and Roman Societies, or remote access to our licensed electronic resources (due to licensing restrictions). However, CA members will be able to access online resources when physically inside the library on the same terms as all library members.

On their first visit, members should show proof of their Classical Association membership. This could be a credit card receipt on a phone, an email from the CA Secretary, or any other receipt or document which displays CA membership.

Access to the Library will be valid for the period of Classical Association membership. Members should be prepared to give basic personal details, such as their name, and at least one form of contact to be added to the readers’ database.

Jointly operated by the Hellenic Society and Roman Society, in collaboration with the Institute of Classical Studies, the Library is located at Senate House (University of London), in Bloomsbury. It is one of the world’s great libraries for the study of Greco-Roman antiquity and contains over 150,000 volumes including 22,000 periodical volumes, with more than 700 active subscriptions; 50% of the collection is published outside the UK; and 15% of the collection is uniquely held here. Almost the entirety of the collection (apart from the rare books) is on open access.

Thanks to grants from the Classical Association and Leventis Foundation, there is a digitization programme in place to make the rare material available online: https://sas-space.sas.ac.uk/view/collections/CCL.html

The Library is staffed by a team of dedicated classicist librarians who can offer specialist advice to all readers, including academics, teachers and students.
